

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

My interest in this project stemmed from my strong desire to record and preserve my mother tongue, the Jieyang dialect, one of the varieties of the Chaoshan dialect group, which is among the most conservative and yet little researched dialects in China. However, the completion of this thesis is not my individual effort but has occurred with the support and help given to me by many people.

I would like, first of all, to express my thanks to my supervisor, Professor David Holm of the Asian Institute of the University of Melbourne, for taking a strong interest in my research into the Chaoshan dialect and thus taking me on as a Ph.D candidate in the Chinese department. I would like to give my gratitude for his academic support and help as well as moral encouragement. I am particularly indebted to my associate supervisor Professor Stephen Matthews from the Linguistics Department at the University of Hong Kong who had involved me in one of his research projects on Chaozhou grammar, through which I gained valuable research experience and knowledge in this field. My gratitude also goes to his generosity, throughout my candidature, of his time in reading and discussing with me my chapters and linguistic issues. I also owe a very special debt to Dr. Wu Yunji and Dr Luo Yongxian of the Asian Institute of the University of Melbourne who, as supervisors in the earlier phase of my candidature, had given me so generously their time, effort and valuable comments, which laid a strong foundation for my current research. I would like also to thank Professor Sander Adelaar of the Asian Institute of the University of Melbourne and Dr Imogen Chen from Victoria University of Technology Melbourne for helping in the supervision. They have provided me with useful comments on numerous chapters. The final version of this thesis has incorporated many invaluable comments and suggestions from my supervisors. No doubt, any shortcomings or errors that this study possesses remain my sole responsibility. Other people to thank include Professor Alexandra Aikhenvald, Professor Walter Bisang, Professor Lien Chin-fa, Professor Lin Lunlun, Professor Shi Qisheng, Dr Hilary Chappell and Dr Tania Strahan, all of whom have been enthusiastic about my project and have given me academic advice and help one way or another.

I am extremely grateful to my friends, in particular, Zhuo Jia and Rong Xia, and relatives in Jieyang who acted as my consultants and spent a large amount of time being recorded and doing the questionnaire with structured lists of sentences; to my family and friends whose love, encouragement, moral support and faith in my ability have kept me going along the daunting but richly rewarding journey of completing a Ph.D. A few of them deserve special mention, my dearest cousin Lin Lin who gave me support of all kinds, my wonderful neighbours Chris and Tony, and two of my dear friends Don and Anne who are also Chaoshan culture enthusiasts. To Gerry, I thank you for your great support at the earlier stage of my study.

I also need to thank a few organisations: the Chamber of Commerce in Hong Kong, for contributing to my data collection and for inviting me to participate in a number of the organisation's local events which had enabled me to get in contacts with the local Chaoshan speakers in Hong Kong; the Research Centre of Chaoshan Culture and History in Shantou, for not only allowing me to have access to their archival materials but also donating to me numerous books on Chaoshan topics.

The research of this thesis has been made possible through an Australian Postgraduate Award scholarship by the University of Melbourne. Funding from the university as well as from the Asian Institute of the University of Melbourne has enabled me to undertake fieldtrips and to attend international conferences.

I would like to express my most sincere and greatest gratitude to Mr Liu Yi Liang (刘艺良), President of the Chao Zhou Natives Association Macau (澳门潮州同乡会), for his generosity in providing funding for the publication of this thesis.

Finally, this thesis is dedicated to my late beloved parents who gave me the freedom to pursue my dreams.
